When we learn a language, there are four skills that we need for complete communication. We usually learn to listen first, then to speak, then to read, and finally to write. These are called the four "language skills":

Skill #1: Listening

Skill #2: Speaking

Skill #3: Reading

Skill #4: Writing

→ The four language skills are related to each other in two ways:

- the direction of communication (in or out)
- the method of communication (spoken or written)

→ Input is sometimes called "reception" and output is sometimes called "production".

INTRODUCTION•

Every English course you will ever take is really about how to communicate effectively. Communication is a multi-step process that requires at least two people who have something to “say” to each other. In order to be successful, each communication requires

- (1) someone to send the message;
- (2) the message itself;
- (3) someone to receive it.

When people want to exchange ideas, they have only three ways to do it:

THE COMMUNICATION PROCESS requires
A SENDER who	A MESSAGE which	A RECEIVER who writes the message	uses words	reads the message
uses body language to send a message	uses actions : gestures, facial expressions, body language	views the non-verbal message
speaks the message	uses words and actions	listens to the message

All communication is incomplete until someone has received and correctly understood the sender's ideas. Would you accomplish anything if you wrote a complaint letter and never mailed it, or talked into a disconnected telephone?

English courses focus most on building writing and reading skills. The two other ways of communicating are also important, yet they are seldom taught.

→ LISTENING SKILLS

Every successful communication requires a sender and a receiver. When a message is spoken, it is received by listening. In other words, listening is the other half of speaking; the two activities belong together.

Infants listen from the moment they are born. They listen to the world around them and then begin to experiment with speech by imitating what they hear. By age two, they are quite good at both speaking and listening. Throughout the rest of their lives, they will continue to use listening as a way of gathering information.

English has two words that describe this "receiving" activity: hearing and listening. Hearing and listening are quite different. Hearing happens every time sound waves strike your ear drum and nerves transmit the vibrations to the brain. It is an automatic thing that you can't really control. Invisible sound waves enter the ear canal and make the ear drum vibrate. These vibrations then make the tiny bones in your ear vibrate too. The nerves in your ear send signals to your brain. You can't stop hearing something, but you can, and often do, stop listening. Listening happens after hearing and refers to the decoding of sound waves in your brain into meaningful words and messages. You can learn to control and improve your listening.

→ SPEAKING SKILLS

Human beings use their voices from the moment they are born to communicate with the world around them. Babies cry to tell their parents they are hungry, cold, or frightened, and they make happy noises when they are content. No matter how vocal babies are however, they cannot tell the care giver exactly what they want.

At about 12 months of age, toddlers begin to develop spoken language skills that make their needs and moods clearer. Slowly they begin to speak by imitating the language they hear around them every day. By age five, they usually speak in clear, mostly correct grammatical sentences. After that, they continue to build their vocabulary and learn how to use words to (1) share information or (2) persuade those around them. What could be more persuasive than a sixteen-year-old asking for the car keys on the day after he/she gets a driver's license? Children (and adults) talk to each other all the time: they make plans together, exchange ideas, discuss friends, rehash sports events, and resolve disputes.
